

BOY D-UP

NFL FOOTBALL

Sixteen! Forty eight! Hut! The gridiron comes to the Gameboy together with all its interruptions and complicated rules. Play the computer - or a friend with the Game Link - and choose any of the NFL teams that grab your fancy.

After kick off, the running back has to get as far upfield as possible until the opposition knocks him down. Then offensive plays are chosen in an attempt to gain 10 yards in four plays, which isn't as easy as it sounds. Alternatively while on defense, the task in hand is to prevent the other team from making their first down - and so regain possession. Punts and field goals are also available.

Big helmets, shoulder pads, and enormous salaries - it may sound like Dallas, but it's American Football!

MATT: Another great Gameboy platform game, with a real sense of humour - the main sprite is hilarious! Not only that, but the play is superb; the locations all have a distinctive look, and the array of tokens to be collected makes for difficult decisions - so much the better!

JAZ: I like this a lot - it's sort of Super Marioland with guns! Marioland and Batman are very similar in appearance, but there's more variety in this. The graphics are excellent, and the gameplay is both challenging and addictive, and there are plenty of different weapons to try out. Highly recommended.

MATT: A game this complex needs clear, straightforward graphics, not dozens of minute stick men lethargically wandering around the pitch. The potential's there, but the game fails to complete the play!

JAZ: Oh dear. When you look at the screen shots, this looks great. But once you see the crippled outcasts from a Lowry painting blurring their way around the screen like slugs you soon get put off. And when the action gets hectic, you end up with a writhing mass of pixels which you can't make head nor tail of. Give it a miss.
